Abstract

The purpose of this investigation was to test the principle hypothesis that people diagnosed with schizophrenia score significantly higher (p>.05) on the suggestibility test mean scores relative to adults without such diagnosis. The results support the theory proposed by Jaynes that the schizophrenic syndrome is a vestige of the Bicameral mind and points to respective approaches in counseling the schizophrenic patient utilizing suggestive methods.